Dear Mr Brinkmann,

after eight years as an electrician I would like to switch to the wet side of building services. My installation routine transfers directly: I read plans, I keep occupied sites clean and safe, I install supply lines in walls and shafts, and I hand over to the customer in an orderly state.

I know that sanitary and heating installation has its own rules - drinking water, drainage, boilers - and I am honest: I have not done them yet. What I offer is disciplined installation work, real customer-facing experience from service calls, and the willingness to retrain properly, including formal qualification.

Kind regards Denis Marek
