Dear Hiring Manager,

I am writing to apply for the doctoral researcher position in machine learning. My Master's thesis on bias in German word embeddings was my first real research experience, and it taught me two things: that I ask research-shaped questions, and that I want proper methodological training - which is exactly what a doctorate in your group would provide.

I will be honest about where I stand: my deep-learning experience so far is one PyTorch course project and my thesis, and my statistics are solid coursework rather than research practice. What I bring is curiosity, a working student habit of careful data cleaning that nobody sees when it is done well, and communication skills from three years of client contact.

The group's work on fair and interpretable methods is the reason this position is my first choice; the commitment to responsible supervision matters to me as much as the research itself.

Sincerely, Nora Falk
